Hi Scott,

I've been taking a look at some of the labour economics journals on the CABS journal list - I am still willing to try and get this published in a CABS 3 or 4 journal - if this is OK with you? My next identified target is the British Journal of Industrial Relations (CABS 4). I can't see any existing papers related to domestic workers or prevalence, but they do publish on migrant workers and precarity. What do you think? If you're agreeable, I have some time on Thursday to complete the submission process and, if we are again a desk reject, the author guidelines suggest that at least this might happen quickly.

Subsequent possible targets are Labour Economics (CABS 3), possibly the Journal of Population Economics (3) and the Industrial Law Journal which does have some existing articles that we could reference.

Let me know your thoughts

Best wishes

Caroline

Oh my! What can I do to help? Should we focus on an applied stats journal? Or a labour economics journal?

OH! Happy New Year!

Best,
Scott

Morning Scott. I hope that you are doing fine.

Well, our paper continues to boomerang! I'll check out some of the economic statistical papers this month and see if there may be a fit.

Onwards and upwards

Best wishes
Caroline

You don't often get email from irjoffice@wiley.com. Learn why this is important

Dear Dr. Emberson,

"Quantifying hidden exploitation: Dual method prevalence estimates of labour exploitation among domestic workers in the United Kingdom"

Thank you for submitting your manuscript to IRJ which I have read with considerable interest. It is concerned to better measure and assess the nature and extent of labour exploitation among the population of domestic workers in the UK. Its central contribution, on your own assessment, is to shed new light on how quantitative methods may be used to estimate the exploitation risk of vulnerable workers entering the UK on restricted visas. As such it requires, in my judgement, specific knowledge and understanding of relatively advanced quantitative techniques that render it more suitable for a publication in economic statistics and quantitative methods rather than employment relations.

I am sorry to disappoint you on this occasion.
