Dear Dr Emberson,

Thank you for submitting your manuscript, "Quantifying Hidden Exploitation: Dual-Method Estimation of Labour Exploitation Risk Among Domestic Workers in the United Kingdom", to Journal of Business Ethics for publication consideration. Your paper uses empirical data collected from a hard-to-reach population of domestic workers who are at risk of labour exploitation. You employ respondent-driven sampling and network scale-up methods to estimate the prevalence of exploitation within the broader population. You argue that the use of these methods illuminates the nature and extent of the risk of labour exploitation faced by these vulnerable workers, who arrive in the UK on restricted visas with the hope of securing decent work, which has profound implications for policy and practice.

In my initial evaluation of each submitted manuscript, I identify whether the manuscript sufficiently satisfies editorial guidelines of the Journal of Business Ethics, provides a clear theoretical contribution and implications for the domain of business ethics, and has some likelihood to be favourably evaluated by our reviewers. When a submitted manuscript fails to satisfy one or more of these criteria, a decision is made to return the manuscript instead of sending it to reviewers as a part of our double-blind review process.

I have carefully read the submitted manuscript and I regret to inform you that I have decided not to send your manuscript to our reviewers for their comments and evaluation. In my assessment, the potential contributions to our current knowledge of business ethics are too limited for publication in the Journal of Business Ethics. The journal's views of the ethics domain have been refined in a series of editorials which you might find helpful in evaluating journal's scope and expectations. You can view these editorials in the JBE website. The following editorial may be especially useful: <https://link.springer.com/article/10.1007/s10551-016-3414-1>. A recent collection of editorial essays by JBE Editors also provides insights into expectations in particular fields, including in this field; <https://link.springer.com/collections/bjbfhaicgc>.

Thank you for the opportunity to read your paper and for considering the Journal of Business Ethics as a possible outlet for your research. Although this paper was rejected and cannot be resubmitted to the Journal of Business Ethics, we hope this outcome does not discourage you from considering the Journal of Business Ethics as a place of publication for your future research. Good luck with further developments of your inquiry

With kind regards,

Ernesto Noronha
